Traditional CV. Traditional CV. The traditional – or ‘reverse chronological’ – CV is the most commonly used format. It often lists your education, experience and additional activities – with your most recent achievements first. CVs and Cover Letters are the first impression you give to a potential employer. They detail experience, range of skills and suitability for a specific role. Whether the application is speculative or for a specific vacancy, you need to present yourself in the most positive way. Top Tips. Do your research – A CV is only ever as good as it is relevant and tailored to your chosen field. Think about key skills and other requirements and how you match them. Be selective – Make sure you give relevant experience room and keep essentials (such as contact details) to a minimum.; Make it look good – A well-presented CV ensures that recruiters find all relevant ...A CV is a document that outlines your background and experience so that employers can assess your suitability for a job. (It's short for curriculum vitae, but no-one calls them that any more.) Many employers – including around a third of graduate recruiters in Ireland – ask for job applications in the format of CV and covering letter.
